Live Chat

What You Should Know Before Starting the Conversation

BY LAURIE PETERSEN

Speed, lower cost and customer adoption are making live chat an increasingly popular method of delivering online customer service. In its latest survey of 100 retailers during fourth quarter 2012, the e-tailing group found that more than half the surveyed merchants, 56%, are now using live chat. That's up from 47% in the same period last year.

Customer participation is on the rise as well. Shoppers like live chat because it's convenient. They can multitask and get their questions answered on the spot. Nearly 70% of all Internet shoppers have now engaged in live chat, and 20% prefer it to any other method of contact, according to the 4th annual survey conducted by BoldChat.

So-called proactive chat, in which a strategically timed question is put to the customer at some point in his or her site visit, is also on the rise, says BoldChat, with 23% using it in fourth quarter 2012, versus 21% in 2011.

Timing and approach are everything where proactive is concerned. Customers who are lingering on a product page or with their shopping cart may appreciate the appearance of a support query asking if they need help, whereas inserting an agent when the customer first arrives can come off as too intrusive.

Some retailers, such as Best Buy, have eliminated email customer support altogether and are relying on live chat to provide the service.

Getting Started

So if live chat is now expected as part of the customer experience, what does a live chat operator need to know, and how do you build the service into your budget?

While fewer agents can answer more questions, a chat operator's skillset is not the same as a telephone operator's skillset. For starters, there's basic spelling knowledge required in addition to product knowledge.

Many systems have a spellcheck function, but contextual language understanding is still required. Also, there's the need to be able to respond to multiple, simultaneous queries—which is what can make live chat a cost-effec-

What To Ask

What should you include in an RFP for a Live Chat vendor?

- Are you a specialist or an integrated solution? Does your company offer live chat only or as part of a suite of services?
- If integrated, can live chat be separated out?
- How can the experience be customized for branded messaging?
- Do you understand our industry?
- Specify how many agents you are starting with.
- Can we easily add agents?
- How does agent assignment work?
- Does the ability exist to insert an agent photo?
- Is the service SaaS based or does it require IT involvement?
- How does it integrate with social?
- How does it integrate with mobile?
- Is there a video option? (Note that audio or video eliminates an operator's ability to handle multiple clients simultaneously.)
- Can screens be shared?
- What reporting is provided?
- Can conversions be tracked?
- What is the security, particularly for regulated industries such as financial services and healthcare?
- Does it integrate with other messaging systems? (AIM, Google Chat, other)
- What training is included? How is it provided?
- What hours is customer support available?
- What is the performance record (up time) of the chat vendor's platform?
- Is service priced at a flat per-agent fee or per transaction?
- Is there a minimum fixed contract?
- Can you supply references in our industry?

tive option.

Prices vary depending on the number of seats required and the complexity of the feature range offered by the live chat vendor. A typical starting point ranges from $49 to $89 per month for one seat, and a reduced cost after that for each additional seat. However, each vendor has a specific price structure and enterprises are priced on a consultative basis.

If You Do It Yourself

Mobile capabilities are increasingly important as tablets and smartphones become devices of choice. Consumers expect the same capabilities in their mobile shopping as in their laptop shopping.

In the smallest businesses, where proprietors might actually be the ones answering the questions, mobile takes on another magnitude of importance because the flexibility to answer questions wherever you are is important. (Think of it as the equivalent of a pager.)

If you're not going to man your live chat service consistently, it's better not to have it at all. Or, make it crystal clear to customers when this service is available and then deliver during those times.

STELLAService, a customer service measurement company, clocked a live-chat-agent wait time of 1.5 minutes at electronics retailers in October 2012. In the week of Cyber Monday and Black Friday, that escalated to almost 6 minutes, according to CEO Jordy Leiser.

"If the value of the live chat experience is that it's an instantaneous thing," Leiser notes, "then you're doing yourself a disservice by not doing it well."

Vendors vary from live chat as part of a suite of services (some call it multimodal) to standalone live chat. Over the past year or two, Oracle has acquired several live chat companies (including ATG/eStara and Right Now), and LogMeIn acquired Bold Chat (which it says will continue to operate independently). Industry consolidations and acquisitions are likely to continue, so it's important to discern, if possible, whether your independent provider will be swallowed by someone larger, and if that matters to your business.

Most vendors offer a free trial demo period averaging 30 days to provide potential buyers with a chance to test drive the platform. There are differences in the customer look and feel of each product, but it's the backend agent view that tends to show the most variance. For instance, how easy is it to tap into customer history from the operator's view? And how obvious is it that a customer has been waiting online for an answer? The ability to see who is actively asking a question and tie that back to the customer's history is a valuable offering. Take the opportunity to try before you buy.

A Sampling of Vendors

The information below shows the variations in some representative chat vendors. Ask about promotional price offers as these come and go all the time. The information contained here was drawn from public sources with attempts to validate directly with all vendors. We recommend you consider this directional and a start to your own research.
